

I've heard you may preempt existing state telemarketer privacy laws in favor of a nationwide law that may be lesser than the existing state law. As a resident of Indiana and having been on the state's "No Call" list for the past year, it has been marvelous knowing that, when the phone rings, I'll most likely WANT to talk to the person on the other end. Indiana's law works wonders: about 2 or 3 calls this year have been telemarketing-type calls as opposed to several per week before it was implemented. I'm not against a nationwide law, but please don't require states with existing laws to change theirs, especially to a lesser standard. Thanks for your time.
